Zac Sunderland navigates the world June 22, 2009

<http://www.zacsunderland.com/index.html>

Zac Sunderland's quest to circumnavigate the globe solo on his own sailboat is the story of dreams come true after years of preparations. His year on his boat is drawing to an end. He departed from Marina del Rey this time last year and now he is making his way up the Baja coast toward California. He should arrive home any day now. I have occasionally checked his blog and even downloaded Google Earth to learn more about this young man who took on the challenge to sail the world alone.

He may have been alone on his boat, but his experience is very different from the days of Christopher Columbus. With his computer at hand, he has been able to stay in contact with people on land and take on challenges that would have been impossible even a generation ago. Watching Google Earth as it hones in on Zac's position is an amazing reminder that we really do live on a finite planet. We are reminded everyday that we need to be eco conscious and eco friendly. Keeping our blue planet healthy will be the biggest challenge of all. Looking at Google Earth is an inspiring way to be reminded that we are all on this planet together.
